

This is to inform you about the poor choice the FCC is about to possibly make regarding Low Power FM and allowing it to take over more FM translators from great stations like KLOVE, which is a nationwide, not-for-profit by FCC rules, Christian radio station that airs nationwide (and can be found at www.KLOVE.com). As a regular listener of KLOVE and a Christian who prefers this programming on a national basis because of my travels, I find KLOVE serves me rather well. It is very popular and provides a great family set of music that people of all generations can listen to without being offended by tasteless music and commercials. If KLOVE was replaced by something else on a LPFM station, there is no guarantee that folks would even listen to the LPFM station, but it would merely run itself due to the need to sell commercials to survive. The LPFM community feels there is no need or little value for KLOVE on the airwaves. Well, if the FCC does its research (and maybe one of your staffers), it will see KLOVE has actually expanded into new markets and in its popularity with all sorts of generations. The moral fiber of this great nation is at stake here. It is definitely in the public interest to serve great Christian radio to those of us who desire that stream of music in our ears everyday. KLOVE actually saves people and helps them find Christ in their life. By moving KLOVE away from FM translators and having LPFM take over, the FCC is doing a great disservice to those of us who honor Christ with our lives. Please look into this matter because the FCC comment period ends Nov 1 and this needs to be reviewed at length in-depthly. I have responded to the FCC, but need you to help KLOVE maintain a strong presence around Washington State where it is heard on other FM translators.
